Dr. Jim Kerns, NC State University

Diseases can be mysterious as three factors must converge with a certain amount of time to develop: a susceptible host, virulent pathogen, and a conducive environment. Many times, in the Southeast the environment is conducive for disease and a susceptible host is always present. This seminar will focus on the specific information needed about pathogens to assist superintendents in building successful fungicide programs. Specifically, the difference between foliar and root pathogens will be covered and how the management for them is different. Topics such as epidemiology will be addressed to provide confidence that fungicide applications when applied representatively will perform for a certain number of days. Finally, the seminar will cover how fungicides affect the microbiome of the turf.
